Senate Group Renews Probe of Cuban Fiasco

A Senate sub-committee today renewed its inquiry into the Cuban fiasco by calling a high State Department adviser to explain his role in the ill-fated invasion attempt.

Adolf A. Berle, adviser to Secretary of State Dean Rusk and head of the State Department's task force on Latin America, met with sub-committee at a closed-door hearing.

Sub-committee Chairman Wayne Morse (D., Ore.) said last night the "Russian MIGs" that the Castro government was reported to have used to help thwart the invasion actually were U. S. planes sent to the old Batista regime.

Sen. Morse said his Foreign Relations group had heard "not a bit of evidence that there was a single Soviet MIG in Cuba." Previous witnesses included Mr. Rusk and Central Intelligence director Allen V. Dulles.

Assistant Senate Democratic Leader Hubert H. Humphrey (D., Minn.) said yesterday the Joint Chiefs of Staff played a more powerful role in the invasion decision than the CIA or any other group in government. On the whole, he said, the CIA did "a fair good job." (UPI)
